

My Story

I have deep roots here in Atlanta. My Mom's childhood home is a fifteen minute walk from where I live today, and my Dad moved here in the nineties to study at the Woodruff Arts Center. I followed in my Grandfather's footsteps by attending Georgia Tech, and just like him, I've made Midtown home after graduating. I care so deeply about this city, and that's why I am stepping forward to propose a better path for Atlanta's future.

I understand the struggles of everyday Atlantans because I live them. I worry about the cost of buying a home – not in theory, but because I'm uncertain I'll ever be able to afford one. I walk the streets of Atlanta and see how our transportation investments are failing. I wait for MARTA trains and buses that fail to come, I cycle on unsafe streets, and I drive over potholes – sometimes they're just too big to dodge!

I'm an engineer at heart, not a politician. I believe in solutions, not talk. I believe in unity, not division. Our city needs a voice for the next generation. Our city needs a leader who is ready to tackle our challenges.
